Researchers are increasingly using the methods of Ecological Momentary Assessment (EMA) to collect real-time data about events, behavior, and experiences in real-world settings. This talk outlines the rationale for EMA methods, describes the methods and design approaches involved, and presents example data that illustrate the methods and their incremental value.